Q.

Q, Latin, Q, q, Ital, Q, q, black English. Concerning the origin, power, and use of this letter, the antient Latin writers have delivered various opinions to the modern critics. Some of them took it to be superfluous, and therefore probably were unconcerned about it, how or whence it came into their alphabet. Of this number were Nigidius Figulus and Licinius Calvus, who refused to use it at all. Some used c for it indifferently, and writ pegunia, loquuntur, obliquum, and at other times pecunia, locuntur, oblicum. Vid. Syburg de Vet. Rom. Script. Hence some learned moderns finding many words of this kind; others again judging it to be no letter, but only a combined note of cu, must consequently have supposed vulgar custom, and a shorter way of writing, to have introduced it into the alphabet. Of this number was Pompeius Festus, and long before him Ennius, who writ sometimes cuando, and sometimes quando. And indeed custom at this day allows to write cocus, bircus, cum, cur, cotidie, and many others, or coquus, birquus, quum, &c. promiscuously. From such examples, and the frequent changes of each of these into the other, as in coquo, coctum, liqui, lietum, &c. which is no more than an ordinary permutation in letters of the same organ, especially in mutes of the same rank, some have not only affirmed Q to be CV combined as aforesaid, but shewed us the separate parts in this figure C <. These writ sometimes, qis, qae, qid, or cuis, cuae, cuid, which Vossius approved. Quintilian on the contrary takes the figure of this letter, as well as the power, from K, and seems to think both letters superfluous. As to the figure, 'tis just as probable as the former; and as to its power, nothing can be proved from that known pun of Cicero, Ego quoque tibi jure savebo; because Donatus having informed us that in Cicero's time quoquus was writ, it is more probable that he pronounced that word quoque than koke. My arguments for this conjecture are chiefly from Fabius himself, who tells us (Lib. XII. 10.) this letter made syllables harsh; which surely cannot well agree to the sound of k. Besides, he saith in the same place, that Q had a sound unknown to the Greeks (which certainly it had, and for that reason not adopted in their alphabet, of which more below) which evidently proves the Romans sounded it not as k, but very probably as we do. But what neither the antient writers nor the modern were aware of, hath not escaped the sagacity of the learned Dr. Littleton, who has deduced the figure, name, and power of this letter from פ. For as from the Hebrew Caph, the Greeks made Kappa, so from koph, koppa; but finding they had no occasion for it in their alphabet, gave it however a place among their numerals, calling it κόππα ἐπίσημον. For the same reason also, Vau, not being admitted as a letter, found place as a numeral, by the name of Βαυ ἐπίσημον. On the very same account, tzade, or zade, or as we call it zad, was denied the favour of being a letter, but assigned a proper place in their numbers. This proceeding may plainly be accounted for from the genius of both languages. The Hebrew being harsher made use of four letters in each rank of the mutes, namely, two medials in each order; the sound of the one so differing from its neighbour, as the first from the last: the two medials in the first order were ב and ו, or B and V; in the second ג and ק, or G and Q. In the third ד and ז, or D and Z. But the smoother tongue of the Greeks refusing the latter in each order made them amends suitable to their rank, placing the first in their units, the second in their tens, and the third in their hundreds. But to proceed, the old Romans, whose language was perhaps not much softer than the Hebrew, though they framed their alphabet from the Greek, found themselves obliged to restore these numeral marks to the dignity they had enjoyed in the mother alphabet. And thus from Βαυ, or which is the same, the Aeolian digamma Ϝ made their F, that people alone of all the Greeks having learned that sound; and from the Greek κόππα their Q. This letter, I observe, the Latins must have sounded quoppa, if the opinion of several antient and modern critics may be allowed, who affirm this letter to be taken in purely for the sake of its V, to give it a broader sound, as it is very probable the original פ had in Hebrew to distinguish it from ב, whence the Greeks had their κόππα, and mediately the Latins their K. From the third ἐπίσημον, Σάυπι, which, as before noted, was the Hebrew tzade, or as we call it, zad, their z was taken not from the Greek Ζῆτα; for here I am forced to recede from the learned doctor, because the Latin z hath a very hard sound, as the dental γ hath, whereas the Greek Ζῆτα was so soft, that Fabius tells us, the Roman orators were obliged to borrow it from them sometimes, to avoid using their own barbarous z, that is the Hebrew ז, which the Greeks had not, Lib. XII. 10. and in the same place will scarce allow ב, that is, F, to have an humane sound; which surely is softer than γ; and the opinion he had of our Q, I have shewn before. Hence 'tis evident, that the Latin z is not the Greek ζ; and that the orator dislikes as letters all the three ἐπίσημα: and the doctor confesses the figure of Z comes nearer γ, and the small z nearer to the final פ, than to the Greek ζ. But to return to our Q. The figure of Q is easily made from C, by shutting the semicircle, and obliquating the perpendicular line; and C quoppa, differs not at all from the Hebrew פ, when, in compliance to the western way of writing, it is turned to the right. Thus at length the figure, name, and power of this letter are settled. But whereas the learned doctor roundly affirms the Greeks had formerly this letter; I cannot here but avow my dissent, since it neither appears among the Cadmean letters, nor those since invented, whether necessary or compendary: besides, he owns the Greeks did not want it. Yea, Quintilian farther observes, that they could not pronounce it, and is angry that so broad and harsh a sound should be taken into the Latin alphabet, which so embased the Roman, when compared with the Greek elocution. I should next shew its mutual intercourse with its sister mutes; but I have already made the longest preface to one of the shortest letters, and therefore shall only observe, that the resemblance and sound of this mute is nearer to that of her medial sister G, than to C or K her other sisters. For G takes V after her before a vowel, in the same syllable sometimes, as in lingua, extinguo, &c. as Q doth always: which v, whether it be a vowel or a consonant, or neither, as Donatus and others have thought, I had better inquire in that letter than here. Q, in the notes of the antients, Quintus, or Quintius; Quint, Quintilius; Quaef. Quaefor; *Q. R.

R, Greek Ρ, ρ, Hebr. ר Resch, from רִישׁ an head, which the figure in some sort represents, in Syriac ܠܐܪܐ Roë, from which the Greek Ρ Rhō. From this letter the learned Littleton is of opinion that the Latins, whether by mistake or design, took the figure of their R, as also the smaller r, by curtailing the larger; and that after they had inserted Q from the Hebrew, and considered that the figure of the Greek rhō was the very same with their P, for distinction, an appendage or tail was by them added to it. But undoubtedly he is mistaken in this part of his conjecture. For we are certain from their monuments still remaining, that the most antient Greeks had both P and R in their alphabet: witness the Baudelotian monument, and the pillars of Herodes Atticus, that famous critic and antiquary, vid. Grut. Inscript. p. 27, where we find this form R at least seven times; to omit what both Pliny and Tacitus acquaint us with, that the figure of the Latin letters was almost the same with that of the antient Greeks. It seems more probable to me, that the Latins observing the Greeks to have two characters for one sound, which they had not in the rest, viz. P and R, took the former of them into their alphabet for their P, judging this figure most significant of the power of half the B, as P is. This easy conjecture if none hath made before, must have happened by not observing the antient Greeks had R as well as P to characterize their rhō. This letter, R, is in the alphabet put last of all her sister liquids, undeservedly, being indeed τῶν ἡμιφώνων γενναϊότατον, as Dionysius Halicarnass. calleth it; and might pretend to the first place, since, though not fully, yet more of it may be sounded without a vowel than any of the rest. Add to this, that in the Greek tongue it makes a syllable pure, and takes before it an aspiration: both which privileges belong to vowels. Whether the aspiration ought to be sounded before or after this letter, is not agreed on: reason, and the custom of the Aeolians, who prefixed sometimes γ and sometimes β before it, makes for the former opinion; and the use of the Latins, who write rhamnus, rhetor, rhinoceros, rhombus, &c. may seem to countenance the latter. But I observe that in words of Greek extraction the Latins often neglected this aspiration, as in radix, rigeo, rosa, and in other words at pleasure either omitted or inserted it, as in raphanus, and rhapbanus, romphaea, or rhomphaea. The Hebrews gave this letter the right of a guttural, never doubling it at all; and indeed this sound is formed in the upper part of the throat, but so as vibrated by a quaver of the tongue and alision on the teeth, it makes a sound like the grinning of a dog, whence it is called the canine letter: but the Romans, on the contrary, gave it so soft and lisping a sound, that in writing they sometimes omitted it, calling the Etrusci Thusci, or Tusci; and especially before s; thus Ennius writ profus, rusus, for prorsus, rursus: which is less to be wondered at, because the most antient Latins doubled not their consonants. Yea, the sound of this lisped r was so near that of its neighbour s, that they writ asa, casmen, Papyssi, for ara, carmen, Papyrii; and we find the termination os, as well as or, in good writers still, as particularly in the prince of poets *arbo*s and *bono*s frequently occur; and *labo*s, *vapo*s, &c. in others. But the soft sound of this letter is in nothing more plain, than its interposition to hinder the collision of two vowels, as if it had been little more than a breathing, as in murex, nurus, from μῦρξ, νῦρξ. But to proceed: Though the Grammarians call all the liquids immutables, they are often changed reciprocally into one another; and to say nothing of the rest here, this has not only an intercourse with the sisterhood, but often with several of the mutes. First with her sister l, as from puer, puera, puella; so from καθήλις is made cantherius; and as caelulius was antiently writ for caeruleus, so on the contrary latiaris for latialis. With her sister m the instances are more rare; but common enough with n: for as from δῶρον, and πλήρης, are donum and plenus, so from μόνος, Aeol. μένος, and from μόνα, are merus and mora. In some words r or n are writ indifferently, as in aereus or aeneus. I will instance as briefly as I can the intercourse of this liquid with some of the mutes: with c, as paucus from παῦρος; with d, corium from κόδιον, meridies from medidies, querquedula for querquerula, from querquerus; and antiently ar in many words was used for ad, as in arlabi, arfinis, arvorsus, for adlabi, &c. with g, as from ἀγνῆ agna, so seges from serere. This letter by poets is used in describing motion, noise, indignation, or violence. Vid. Voss. Inst. Orat. 4, 2. R. in the notes of the antients, R. vel Ro. signifies Roma; R. C. Romana civitas; R. G. C. Rei gerendae causa; R. F. E. D. Reſtē factum & dictum; R. G. F. Regis filius; R. P. Res publica, vel Romani principes; R. R. R. Res Romana ruet ferro, fame, flamma.

S.

S The Latin capital is taken with very little or no variation from the antient Greek alphabet, and is at least of as great antiquity, as that of the Scythian bow (Σ); and from this drawn into a smaller form is made s, which is used only as a final both in Greek and Latin, except in the compendary note σ for στ. The Greeks have another, but less antient figure of this letter; viz. C; from which the smaller initial and medial C is sometimes used. The Scythian bow is taken from the Phenician alphabet without variation; as that is from the Hebrew שׁ, sin, by drawing it in a jaçent, instead of an erect Form. Hence the Dorians, who perhaps immediately received it from the Hebrews, as Herodotus and Pindar acquaint us, called this letter σάν san, though the Ionians called it σίγμα sigma, from the Chaldean סמכא, simcha, by transposing the second and third letters: which opinion is made more probable by the small form of the Greek sigma σ, being no other than the D turned to the right hand in complaisance to the western way of writing. But there are strong reasons to think D samech only a secondary letter, substituted for שׁ sin, the better to distinguish it from שׁ schin; wherein they had done wisely, provided they had exterminated שׁ sin, which now seems supernumerary, because both these letters שׁ and D, have one and the same sound, as appeareth from the Ephraimitish pronunciation of Sbibboleth. And hence we may account for the different Greek names of this letter, san being so called from sin, before samech was introduced; and sigma from samech, after such introduction. But to proceed: the Greeks admit this letter into no class in the distribution of their alphabet; whether in honour to it, as being invested with a despotic power peculiar to itself, or in dishonour, looking upon it only as a substitute and attendant on the rest, is uncertain; but I should think the latter, since its servile offices are so very many in declining their nouns, and conjugating their verbs more especially. For in all future tenses of verbs baryton, and all the tenses derived from thence, with their participles in every conjugation, voice, and mode, this letter is servile; being explicit, implicit, or potential, in them all. And this servile use probably may have been the reason why some among the Greeks have accounted it only an aspiration; in which number was Plato the philosopher, who calls it the breathing letter. And indeed we find both the Greek spirits changed into this letter: into the lenis, as in ἔμμι, sum, ὀπός, succus; the aspirate more frequently, as in ἄλς sal, ἔξ sex, ἐπτά septem. This may likewise have occasioned the neglect of it by the Romans in taking words from the Greeks, as in tego, fallo, from τέγω, σφάλλω, and sometimes in derivatives of their own, as in pumex from spuma. Certain it is that some learned men among the Greeks avoided a frequent use of it. Plato and Eubulus, two comic poets, made sport in the theatre with this verse of Euripides, Ἔσσω σ' ὡς ἴσασιν Ἕλληνας ὄσοι. Yea Pindar was so unjustly severe, that he writ several odes without it: and the whole spartan nation preferred the canine snarl of P to the serpentine hiss of s. The Romans also melted it so much, especially in the end of words, as scarcely to be heard; inasmuch that even in writing before the interrogative ne, the comic poets neglect it, as in audin'? credin'? dabin'? for audisne, &c. and Virgil avoided ending a word with this letter, and beginning the following word with the same, as, Despectus tibi sum, nec qui sim, quaeris, Alexi; orators also forbid this in their compositions. Yea the antient poets, in imitation of the Greeks, when they pleased, cut it off in the end of a word before a short, and sometimes a long syllable in the following word, as is manifest in that of Ennius, Egregie cordatus homo catu' Aelius Sextus. And not only Ennius, Naevius, and Pacuvius do this, but Catullus; and even Cicero hath not altogether denied himself this liberty. But though in general this sound may seem to have been unpleasant to both nations, it has without doubt in its proper place its particular graces, and the most that is said against it regards chiefly its too frequent, or improper use. The Latins, in making some Greek words denizons of Rome, prefix this letter, as in scribo, smaragdus, stella, from γράφω, μέραγδος, τέλλω; and even st antiently, as in stitem, stlocum, in words of their own tongue: sometimes they interpose it, as in discus, musca, from δίσκος, μυῖα. The Greeks also in Latin names of men ending in a add this letter, as, Νεμᾶς, Φιμβρίας, for Numa, Fimbria. In Tully's time, and a while after, this letter was doubled, as in caussa, cassus, for causa, casus, v. Quint. 1, 7. In conjugating Latin verbs, it is substituted for almost all the consonants, as in arsti from ardeo, tersti from tergeo, vexi for vecsi, from veho, vulsi from vello, pressi from premo, posui from pono, repsi from repo, torsti from torqueo, ussi from uro, versum from verti, as grammarians observe; but this to me seems not so much a substitution, as a servile formative power given it in Latin, as, I have observed before, it had in the Greek tongue. This semivowel, for so the Latins seem to acknowledge it, by prefixing e as they do before the other liquids, admitteth after it of the mutes, c, p, q, t, as in scapha, spes, squalor, stadium, but none of the liquids, except m, and that chiefly, if not only in words derived from the Greek tongue. Concerning the intercourse between this and its neighbour R, see that letter. S. in proper names, is read Sextus; SP. Spurius. In appellatives, S. A. Secundum artem; SC. Senatusconsultum; S. P. Q. R. Senatus populusque Romanus; S. S. S. Stratum super stratum; S. V. B. E. E. Q. V. Si vales bene est, ego quoque valeo; a form used in Cicero's time, in the beginning of letters.
